Training Objectives

The primary objectives of ACT training Russ Harris are to equip participants with effective tools to help clients manage stress, anxiety, depression, and other psychological challenges. The training emphasizes the development of skills that promote acceptance of difficult thoughts and emotions while encouraging actions aligned with personal values. By the end of the program, attendees should be able to confidently apply ACT interventions in clinical or coaching settings.

Core Principles of Acceptance and Commitment Therapy

The foundation of ACT training Russ Harris lies in understanding the six core processes that comprise Acceptance and Commitment Therapy. These processes work synergistically to improve psychological flexibility, which is the ability to stay present and engaged with life despite discomfort.

Psychological Flexibility

Psychological flexibility is the central goal of ACT and refers to the capacity to adapt to situational demands, shift mental perspectives, and balance competing desires, needs, and life domains. ACT training Russ Harris emphasizes this concept as a key outcome, guiding participants on how to foster it in their clients.

Six Core Processes

- Acceptance: Embracing thoughts and feelings without trying to change their frequency or form.
- Cognitive Defusion: Learning to perceive thoughts and feelings as transient, separate from self.
- Being Present: Maintaining mindful contact with the present moment.
- Self-as-Context: Developing a sense of self that is distinct from one's experiences.
- Values Clarification: Identifying what truly matters to the individual.
- Committed Action: Taking effective, values-guided steps toward meaningful goals.

Russ Harris's training provides detailed explanations and practical exercises for each of these processes, enhancing understanding and application.
