Practical Tips for Incorporating Active and Concrete Verbs

Incorporating active and concrete verbs into legal writing requires a deliberate approach. Here are some practical tips to help legal professionals enhance their writing:

1. Identify Passive Constructions

Review your drafts for sentences that use passive voice constructions. Look for forms of "to be" (is, are, was, were) followed by a past participle. For example:

- Passive: "The contract was signed by the parties."
- Active: "The parties signed the contract."

2. Replace Vague Verbs with Concrete Alternatives

When you encounter vague verbs such as "do," "make," or "have," consider replacing them with more concrete alternatives that specify the action. For instance:

- Vague: "They made a decision."
- Concrete: "They rendered a decision."

3. Use Action Verbs to Clarify Roles and Responsibilities

Clearly define the actions of each party involved in a legal document by using action verbs. This approach clarifies roles and responsibilities, reducing confusion. For example:

- Instead of saying, "The agreement allows for notifications," say, "The agreement requires the parties to notify each other."

4. Read Aloud for Flow and Clarity

Reading your legal writing aloud can help identify areas where the language may be confusing or unclear. Pay attention to sentences that feel cumbersome or overly complex, and revise them to include active and concrete verbs.

5. Seek Feedback from Colleagues

Collaborate with colleagues or peers to review your writing. Fresh eyes can identify passive constructions or vague language that may have been overlooked. Engaging in peer review fosters a culture of clarity and precision in legal writing.
