The AP U.S. History curriculum divides early American history into distinct periods, with Period 1 covering approximately 1491 to 1607, and Period 2 spanning 1607 to 1754. Period 1 focuses on the pre-Columbian era and initial European exploration and contact, while Period 2 emphasizes the establishment of European colonies and the development of distinct colonial societies. A thorough understanding of these periods is critical for success on the apush period 1 and 2 practice test because questions often assess knowledge of diverse Native American cultures, European motivations for exploration, and the economic and social structures that emerged in colonial America.

Period 1: Pre-Columbian Societies and Early Exploration

This subperiod deals with the rich diversity of Native American societies before European contact, including their social structures, economies, and environmental adaptations. It also covers the motives and consequences of European exploration, such as the Columbian Exchange and early encounters between Europeans and indigenous peoples. Key events include the voyages of Columbus, Spanish conquests, and the initial establishment of European settlements.

Period 2: Colonial Foundations and Development

Period 2 examines the growth of European colonies in North America, focusing on English, Spanish, and French colonial endeavors. It addresses the political, economic, and social characteristics of these colonies, including labor systems like indentured servitude and slavery, as well as interactions with Native Americans. This period also highlights the rise of colonial assemblies, religious movements, and regional differences among colonies.

Native American Societies and Cultures

Before European contact, Native American groups exhibited a wide range of cultural practices, political organizations, and economic systems. From the complex civilizations of the Aztecs and Incas to the nomadic tribes of the Great Plains, indigenous peoples adapted to diverse environments. The apush period 1 and 2 practice test often includes questions about these societies' social structures and their changes following European arrival.

European Exploration and Colonization

European powers pursued exploration and colonization for various reasons, including economic gain, religious missions, and geopolitical competition. Spain, France, and England each developed distinct colonial models. The test may assess knowledge of the Spanish encomienda system, French fur trade alliances, and English settler colonies such as Jamestown and Plymouth.

Economic and Labor Systems

Economic motivations shaped colonial development profoundly. Systems like the plantation economy in the South relied heavily on slavery, while the Northern colonies developed mixed economies with diverse labor practices. Indentured servitude was also a significant labor source. Recognizing these economic patterns is essential for answering practice test questions accurately.

Political and Religious Institutions

Colonial governance evolved through a mixture of royal authority, local assemblies, and charters. Religious beliefs also influenced colonial life, from Puritan theocracies to the establishment of religious tolerance in some regions. The apush period 1 and 2 practice test may explore how these institutions affected colonial identity and resistance to imperial control.
