Background of the Oatman Family Expedition

The captivity of the Oatman girls cannot be fully understood without examining the context of their family's journey. The Oatman family, originally from Illinois, sought to migrate westward in 1850 as part of the larger movement of settlers heading towards California during the Gold Rush era. The family consisted of parents Lorenzo and Mary Ann Oatman, along with their seven children, including the daughters Mary Ann and Olive, who would later become central figures in the captivity saga.

The family's route took them through the treacherous deserts and territories inhabited by various Native American tribes. The westward migration was fraught with dangers such as harsh terrain, scarcity of food and water, and potential conflicts with indigenous peoples defending their lands. The Oatmans' expedition was emblematic of the many settler families risking peril for the promise of prosperity in the West.

Motivations for Westward Migration

The Oatman family, like many others during this period, was motivated by the allure of land, opportunity, and gold in California. The promise of a new life drove families to embark on long, hazardous journeys despite the known risks.

Route and Challenges Faced

Their chosen route included crossing the arid regions of present-day Arizona and New Mexico, areas known for their difficult environmental conditions and the presence of Native American tribes wary of encroaching settlers. These factors contributed to the eventual tragedy that befell the family.

Capture and Initial Kidnapping

The pivotal moment in the captivity of the Oatman girls occurred in February 1851, when the family's wagon train was attacked in the Arizona desert. This assault, attributed to a band of Native Americans—most commonly identified as the Yavapai or Apache warriors—resulted in the massacre of most family members and the capture of Mary Ann and Olive Oatman.

The attack was sudden and brutal. While some family members were killed outright, the two girls were spared and taken captive. This kidnapping marked the beginning of a harrowing period of captivity for the sisters, especially Mary Ann, who was just 14 years old at the time.

Details of the Attack

The attack happened near the present-day area of present-day Wickenburg, Arizona. The attackers overwhelmed the family, killing Lorenzo Oatman and others during the assault. Mary Ann and Olive were taken as captives, while other surviving family members either escaped or perished.
